BILLIE BURKE AS PEGGY SHOWN IN ALL MOODS

"Peggy" was especially written to give free play to the special gifts of Billie Burke. It is a comedy because that is Miss Burke's outstanding trait. But "Peggy" also contains good sound drama. It tells, by effect, a comical and logical story of an American girl whose previous affairs are transferred across the ocean to the dear old-fashioned Scotland. There, among the rugged scenery, the rough edges of her character are rounded and she emerges as a real woman.

"Peggy" opens on a luxurious estate near New York City. Miss Burke is discovered standing in a fountain, spraying without fear or favor the house-party guests who have dared her to do "something different." There comes a letter from her mother and guardian in Scotland. He demands that she leave America and the doing of it in which she is being reared, and henceforth remain her home with him, his wife and son, in Scotland. She protests and points a vivid picture of the contrast between her boyish freedom and the restrictions she must be allowed upon her in her new environment. But in the end she goes.

She Sails for Scotland. The action now shifts to a small village not far from Glasgow. Andrew Cameron, stern and proud head of the family, is seen at his hearthside, where his unbending nature recognizes no law but his own. Mrs. Cameron and their son, Colin, are at morning service, and at the close remain to congratulate the new "minister." The Rev. Donald Bruce, on the excellence of his sermon. Colin slips away from the group to walk home with the weaver's lass, Janet McLeod. They have a happy time together. The dramatic scenes which punctuate Miss Burke's comedy. As the Camerons and the minister chat, a telegram is delivered to Cameron. It is from Peggy. She is returning from Glasgow, and will arrive "some time Sunday." The pillar of the church is horrified. The ward traveling on Sunday.

These facts across a valley on a distant hillside, a racing speech appears. Straight toward the spectator comes the speeding, snorting, chattering, smoking and fuming, and finally a rattle of terror follows, started villagers are upset by the station of the meteorite that flashes by them. They flee madly from the path. A staid dame looks from her window and sees the same apparition approach. She rushes into the road to rebuke her hen and chickens. Too late! As she falls prostrate from fright, she is covered by a rain of feathered victims.

On over a small stream and into the main street of the village speeds the motor, leaving in its path a trail of dust and fainting worshippers. At the very entrance to the church village. With this introduction Scotland is prepared for the worst. Andrew Cameron is aghast, but meets a little under the enthusiastic greeting of his niece. The village begins a new life. Peggy is discovered in all sorts of unsuspected situations. Her uncle and the minister find her in overalls, but on her neck under her hat, shimmering with its charms. She tells the children strange and wonderful fairy stories.

She Masquerades as a Boy. After promising faithfully not to drive her car again she borrows a suit of her cousin's clothing and drives forth into the night. A sudden downpour of rain hurls her progress, stalls her engine and forces her to flee for shelter from the abandoned motor. Taking refuge in the village taproom, she orders the local drinker of his fully by replacing filled glasses with empty ones until he is from the place with a shriek of "Spooks!" In her flight she bumps into the minister, coming to remonstrate with the drinker.

Then comes the comic story of Colin and the weaver's lass. Janet is in disgrace, but she refuses to divulge the name of the man, even when brought before a tribunal consisting of Cameron, the minister and his daughter. Peggy discovers Colin in disguise in an adjacent corridor, suspects that he is responsible for Janet's disgrace, and when he is brought to confessing his guilt, she goes herself to the meeting and tells the truth.

Humbled in pride and spirit, Andrew Cameron reveals a softer nature beneath his former hard and unyielding surface. Colin and Janet wed. Peggy determines to return to America. But the young and good-looking minister persuades her to stay.

Billie Burke's Wardrobe. Seen only in importance to seeing Billie Burke, star of the latest Triangle drama "Peggy," is the desire of all lovers of the photoplay, particularly women, to see the wonderful costumes she wears. And such a variety! A small mountain of trunks was needed to convey the many articles, models of the modistes of New York and Paris to the lace station near Los Angeles.

As a society bag of New York, Miss Burke wears a dappled creation of lace and tulle, displaying her arms and shoulders to excellent advantage. A pair of palm-leaf constellations, Miss Burke's next costume, worn in a morning scene in Peggy's luxurious apartment on Fifth avenue. They are of finest silk, delicately embroidered, with wide collar and cuffs. In the scene in Fairland, Miss Burke wears a unique creation of crepe and satin, cut square in the neck and with a full skirt. Follow comes her riding outfit of dainty, well-punctuated prep work. A fetching little hat upon completes the picture.

But her most attractive attire, doubtless, to many, will be the sumptuous clothes she wears in a number of scenes of "Peggy." In strictly up-to-date sport shirt and a pair of shorts she checks the activity of the little Scotch hamlet where she goes to visit her uncle. The letter, most horrified of all, orders her never to wear masculine garb again, and behold! the next thing she does is to put on her cousin Colin's sack suit with soft shirt and bow tie, topped off with a rakish velvet hat.

WAR CHANGES THE FRENCH CUSTOMS IN MAKING LOVE

Old System of Arranging Marriages May Be Done Away With Entirely as Result of European Conflict.

(Associated Press Correspondent.) Paris—Genuine courtship—real love making—as an incident to marriage is one of the innovations that war has brought to France. It may develop into a revolution of the marriage system, and is almost certain in any case to be the death of much of the red tape that has entangled and more or less strangled, euphemistically, the first months of the war but by reason of the authorization of unions of proxy and the infusion of war romance, it is rapidly recovering.

In France there were 245 marriages in January, 1915, as against 2,341 in January, 1914. In December, 1915, there were 1,289, showing a remarkable recovery under the circumstances.

In a great many of these war marriages it is noticed that girls without fortune are for the time being running their more favored sisters a close race, since a great proportion of the marriages celebrated since hostilities began the marriage contract has been dispensed with; no mention of dowry or talk about money; romance has taken the place of finance.

Wounded heroes have in hundreds of cases fallen in love with and married their nurses; nearly every day a story is told of a man in a fighting regiment corresponding with an unknown sympathizer who has come on leave to find that his "good mother" is worth marrying for herself.

Women and girls acting as "godmothers" to unknown correspondents at the front have developed what is lightly called "the dirt at the front" into formidable proportions, and this is at least in part responsible for the most effective marriage agency in the world. The success made by some girls marrying soldiers who have been blinded or maimed almost to the point of total helplessness have stirred the imagination, and love affairs are being every hand by the close communion of sympathetic minds centered on great events and through the constant movement of soldiers coming in contact with new faces, every one of which under present circumstances is bound to be sympathetic.

Some psychologists have inquired whether there was still in France a crying need for desperate marriages and whether the decreasing stability in the country was not due in great part to the obstacles of marriage and the more material considerations that always entered into it. The war-stirring incidents of the war have unquestionably brought everyone into closer union and there seems to have been general forgetting of old scores that kept antagonisms, and even families, apart. There have been many reconciliations through the exchange of news and men, and have been re-united over the tomb of a fallen hero.

After June 1 Mr. Jose will bid farewell to the stage for a time, and those who have his time after that time will do so in the photograph. A great inspiration may be made by telegraphing Matinee, wherever, but no time should be lost in so doing.

Probably in no time in the entire has Mr. Jose been in better voice than at the present time, and perhaps his great critics have been mistaken in their praise of the famous performer. Unlike most professional entertainers,
